

ASSET MANAGEMENT

"So, What's the Bottomline?"

"Better Visibility and Improved Productivity."

Is Your Asset Management Solution Delivering Clarity & Efficiency?

Asset management is a strange paradox. While it is a top management issue, it is also an acknowledged fact that few organizations today have a thorough understanding of what, exactly, is on their networks at any given time. The function transcends key areas like Finance, IT, Admin and lands directly on the CEO's desk as well. With considerable overlap of information, the reality is that the confusion leads to avoidable mess up of communication across the organization.

While newer technologies and tools have made way into end user organizations, they arrive in bits and pieces, and not complete solutions. So, the investments in asset management are made. But the execution of the solution still eludes the broader organizational purpose. The result of ineffective asset management is always: poor visibility of fixed assets and other key inventory, and consequently, lower resource productivity. It frustrates top managers that initiatives in this area peter out leading to last minute fixes rather than strategic solutions that everyone can benefit from.
